

Roger Bootle

Roger Bootle is Managing Director of Capital Economics and one of the most respected voices on the current turmoil. He is one of The City's best-known and most widely-read economists.

After lecturing at Oxford, Roger became one of the few of his profession to get experience as a dealer, at Citibank. He then switched to the role of Group Chief Economist at HSBC and Lloyds Merchant Bank, and served as advisor to the House of Commons Treasury Committee.

Under the previous Conservative administration Roger was appointed to the Chancellor's Panel of independent economic forecasters, famously known as 'The Seven Wise Men.' He is a regular columnist and author of a number of books on monetary economics including Theory of Money, Index-Linked Gilts and The Death of Inflation, the latter of these becoming a best-seller and noted for its foresight. He also predicted the 2008 banking crisis in his book Money For Nothing, and later studied the causes, effects and future threats of the crisis in The Trouble with Money.

Noted for delivering often uncomfortable truths, Roger has an impressive record of forecasting major market, economic and monetary events including the real estate bubble, the impact of the credit crunch, the collapse of the 'dotcom' boom, the UK's removal from the ERM, and the period of sustained low inflation in Europe and the US. Roger and his Capital Economics team won the Wolfson Economics prize for the best plan for dealing with member states leaving the eurozone.
